her word. She had gone back to Ger many, taken an apartment in Hildesheim secured a lady companion to protect her rather girlish gaze and ways, and settled down for the spring and summer. The change from Harry to Hildesheim was somewhat bewildering and at times almos took her breath away, but on the whole she felt positive that it was a relief, and she loved German people and adored afternoon coffee and evening bread. she got on nicely. She had friends in sheim, young married women who had been her schoolmates in Hanover six fore, and they all took time to be nice to her, although their condolence over her situation were so sincere as to be absolutely trying. Isabelle had become a thorough cynic, but her thorough cynicism stopped short of trying to make a German wife and mother understand an American grass-widow. Lini, who had been her dearest friend in the pension days, was the proud possessor of four babies and of a husband whose cards bore the glorious inscription :

"Freiherr Emmo Groning"

So Lini was a Frau Baronin now asked, when they sat alone in the glass "It means 'zur Disposition," " said Lini

"It is so sad that you have no chil-dren," said Lini regretfully. "All would have been well then. Children are the quick pull to test its firmness—and the Lini sighed heavily. Isabelle was in. Lisbeth, and once she was mounted on over her tale of woe, and took another cake.

"Yes, that is true," said Lini, pouring some more coffee into her friend's cup; "it is very singular—that way they all do across the water. If it was my husband, I might be quite furious and still I could not go." She took another cake. "But then, also—I would not if I could. Am I not his wife?"

The Frau Major drank her final cup of coffee, and signified that she must depart. Lini kiesed her on both cheeks, and, "It means 'zur Disposition,' 'said Lini passing the cakes.

"And what does 'zur Disposition' mean?" Isabelle demanded, taking one of the puff-paste tarts.

"It means that he is in the military service; 'a. D.' means 'ausser Dienst,' and means that an officer has withdrawn from the army for some reason."

Isabelle langued. 'I am a 'Frau a. D.,' "she exclaimed merrily. "What a joke!"

But Lini did not see the joke—her eyes were misty.

"Perhaps it will all come right," she murmured.

"But I don't want it to come right," the caller protested.

"You have no idea how horrid he was. He was so jealous that I couldn't have a peaceful minute, and when men came to call—well, you ought to have no children "said Lini rearry on the polity of the ment of said Lini reach and spiendidly firm," said Lini so so and that you have no children "said Lini rearry on both the said Lini so so and there there the polity support the lieutenant was the major and the lieutenant was thin and sake lieutenant was thin and the major and the lieutenant was thin and the major that the coffee pot had been duly absorbed, and Isabelle's heart rose high when she was a jealous that I couldn't have a peaceful minute, and when men came to call—well, you ought to have no children "said Lini rearry of the lieutenant was the coffee pot had been duly absorbed, and Isabelle's heart rose high when she was the mounts brought out.
